

Dear FCC, This comment is in regard to satellite radio. I commute weekly between Camp Lejeune, NC, and Washington DC. Satellite radio not only provides a consistent mechanism for me to listen to news and commentary, but provides a consistently reliable source of traffic and weather information for me as I drive to Washington. I happily pay for this service, and I do not think the NAB should infringe upon my right to obtain this "local content" through satellite radio. I need traffic and weather enroute and for my destination, and should be able to get this information over satellite radio if I choose. Certainly I could also obtain this same information in text form over a wireless internet browser, but I find it somewhat safer to keep my eyes on the road. Thanks for your consideration.
